

The Penn Program on

Democracy, Citizenship, and Constitutionalism

Graduate Workshop

“Indigenous Peoples’ Courts:
Egalitarian Juridical Pluralism, Self-Determination, and the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.”

Christopher J. Fromherz

(Law, University of Pennsylvania)

Thursday, January 17th
College Hall 209
University of Pennsylvania

<http://www.sas.upenn.edu/dcc/>

TABLE OF CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION 2

I. INTERNATIONAL LAW, SELF-DETERMINATION, AND MINORITY RIGHTS..... 10

 A. Overview of International Human Rights 11

 B. Self-Determination and Minority Rights in International Law 13

 1. The Roots of Self-Determination and Minority Rights 14

 2. The Modern Standard: External v. Internal Self-determination 17

II. INTERPRETING INDIGENOUS PEOPLES’ RIGHTS UNDER THE DRIP 24

 A. The Fall and Rise of Indigenous Peoples’ Rights under International Law..... 24

 B. A Method for Interpreting the Rights Conferred in the DRIP..... 29

 1. A Trinity of Rights..... 30

 2. Fleshing Out Article 3..... 32

III. EGALITARIAN JURIDICAL PLURALISM: A TEST CASE 35

 A. Egalitarian Juridical Pluralism in Context 36

 B. Is Egalitarian Juridical Pluralism an “Appropriate” Exercise of Article 34? 38

 C. Indigenous Courts, EJP, and the Objections Registered by the Opposing States 41

CONCLUSION..... 43

INTRODUCTION

On September 13, 2007 the United Nations General Assembly (“GA”) overwhelmingly adopted the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, (“DRIP”) which recognized, inter alia, the right of such peoples to “self-determination” (Article 3), “autonomy or self government” (Article 4) and “the right to promote, develop and maintain . . . in the cases where they exist, juridical systems or customs, in accordance with international human rights standards” (Article 34).¹ The Declaration is arguably the single most important development in the history of international law relating to indigenous peoples.² On its date of passage in the GA, Ban Ki-moon, Secretary General of the UN, called it “a triumph for indigenous peoples around the world” and noted that it “marks a historic moment when UN Member States and indigenous peoples have reconciled with their painful histories and are resolved to move forward together on the path of human rights, justice and development for all.”³

Like the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights⁴ (“UDHR”) and other GA declarations addressing specific human rights concerns or demographics,⁵ the DRIP is generally considered an aspirational document that broadly declares a set of rights and places all declaring

¹ United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, G.A. Res 61/295, arts. 3, 4, 34, U.N. GAOR, 61st sess., 107th plen. mtg., U.N. Doc. A/RES/61/295 (2007) (hereinafter “DRIP”) (emphasis added).

² This assertion holds even given the non-binding or “soft law” character of the Declaration and the parallel existence of binding multilateral treaties that deal, in greater or smaller measure, with indigenous peoples. For example, WLO Convention 169—a binding treaty—protects rights for indigenous peoples, but recognizes only very limited rights with regard to indigenous laws and customs.

³ Secretary General, Office of the Spokesperson, “Statement attributable to the Spokesperson for the Secretary-General on the adoption of the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples,” Sept. 13, 2007, available at <http://www.un.org/apps/sg/sgstats.asp?nid=2733> (last visited Nov. 20, 2007).

⁴ Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 217A, U.N. GAOR, 3rd sess., 67th plen. mtg., U.N. Doc. A/810(III) (1948).

⁵ See, e.g., Declaration of the Rights of the Child, G.A. Res. 1386, U.N. GAOR, 14th sess., 841st plen. mtg., U.N. Doc A/RES/1386(XIV) (1959) (hereinafter “DRC”); Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, G.A. Res. 1904, U.N. GAOR, 18th sess., 1261st plen. mtg., U.N. Doc. A/RES/1904(XVIII) (1963) (hereinafter “DERD”); Declaration on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, G.A. Res. 2263, U.N. GAOR, 22nd sess., 1597th plen. mtg., U.N. Doc. A/RES/2263(XXII) (1967) (hereinafter “DEDW”).

States⁶ under a moral obligation to ensure implementation and enforcement of those rights.⁷ And, like past human rights declarations, the DRIP lays a foundation for the creation of future binding international law, primarily expressed through multilateral treaties based on the DRIP's principles, and secondarily through the development of customary international law.⁸ That said, the DRIP is not in and of itself legally binding on States, and violations of the rights declared therein are not necessarily judicially enforceable against States in international courts.⁹

Because of the DRIP's presumptively non-binding character, its enforcement is largely, if not exclusively, dependant upon its voluntary acceptance and implementation by UN Member States. In this sense, the overwhelming international support for the DRIP—involving 144

⁶ Because this paper discusses both “States” in the international sense (i.e. nation-states, as traditionally understood) and “states” in the domestic sense (i.e. political subdivisions within a nation-state), I have adopted the following convention for sake of clarity: “State(s)” is capitalized when referring to nation-states, and lower case when referring to domestic states.

⁷ This is the standard view of such declarations taken by international lawyers and scholars. See ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PUBLIC INTERNATIONAL LAW, VOL. I, 972 (Rudolf Bernhardt ed. 1992) (noting that, while “not treaties” the UN declarations are, at least, “enunciat[i]ons of] important principles”).

⁸ Customary international law (“CIL”) develops where enough States act in a certain way (state practice) with the sense that they are legally obligated to do so (opinio juris) to create customary law binding on all States. The DRIP could advance the development of CIL related to indigenous peoples’ rights if states have implemented—or begin to implement—its principles with opinio juris.

⁹ See Bernhardt, supra note 7 at 972 (“The prevailing opinion is that [UN declarations] do not as such have binding force, since the [GA] does not have the power to make decisions of this kind binding. Such declarations can, however, be wholly or in part an expression of existing rules or principles of international law. Moreover, as evidence of emerging new convictions and as a reflection of the practice of States adopting these declarations, they can influence the development of new norms of international law, either as general principles of law or as rules of customary international law.”). While the prevailing view of such declarations is indeed that they are not legally binding per se, it is worth noting that New Zealand, one of the four States to oppose the DRIP, thought otherwise: “This Declaration is explained by its supporters as being an aspirational document, intended to inspire rather than to have legal effect. New Zealand does not, however, accept that a State can responsibly take such a stance towards a document that purports to declare the contents of the rights of indigenous people. We take the statements in the Declaration very seriously. For that reason we have felt compelled to take the position that we do.” Explanation of Vote by New Zealand, Permanent Representative H.E. Ms. Rosemary Banks, to the U.N. General Assembly, at ¶ 12 (Sept. 13, 2007), available at <http://www.nzembassy.com/info.cfm?CFID=6958589&CFTOKEN=33159055&c=51&l=124&s=to&p=63315> (last visited Nov. 23, 2007) (hereinafter “N.Z. Explanation”). The apparent view of New Zealand would seem to accord with an argument advanced by some that state practice no longer essential to the formation of CIL and that opinio juris, as expressed in non-binding declarations, is enough to crystallize “instant” binding customary law. See Bin Cheng, Custom: The Future of General State Practice in a Divided World, in THE STRUCTURE AND PROCESS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW: ESSAYS IN LEGAL PHILOSOPHY DOCTRINE AND THEORY 513, 532 (J. Macdonald & Douglas M. Johnston eds., 1983) (advancing the theory of “instant” customary law based on opinio juris without State practice).

States¹⁰—suggests that it may be used, in the words of Mr. Ki-moon, “to urgently advance the work of integrating the rights of indigenous peoples into international human rights and development agendas . . . so as to ensure that the vision behind the Declaration becomes a reality.”¹¹

However, unlike some other UN human rights declarations, though not—ironically—unlike the watershed UDHR, the DRIP did not enjoy “universal” support.¹² Four States voted against it: Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the United States.¹³ While Canada’s long-standing support for the DRIP only recently waned after the rise a new government in 2006,¹⁴

¹⁰ The total vote count was 144 States for, 11 abstaining, and 4 against. Azerbaijan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Burundi, Colombia, Georgia, Kenya, Nigeria, Russia, Samoa, and Ukraine abstained. Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the United States opposed the DRIP.

¹¹ Secretary General, supra note 3.

¹² Here, I use “universal” to mean favorable votes by all parties eligible to vote (i.e. Member States) or adoption without vote (signaling full support of Member States). Thus, the Declaration of the Rights of Child, the Declaration on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, and the Declaration on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women all enjoyed universal support in the sense that they passed unanimously. See 1959 Y.B.U.N. 192 (1960) (noting unanimous adoption of the DRC by the GA); 1963 Y.B.U.N. 330 (1965) (noting unanimous adoption of the DERD); 1967 Y.B.U.N. 514 (1969) (noting unanimous adoption of the DEDW). Likewise, the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief (“Religious Intolerance Declaration”) and the Declaration on Rights of Persons Belonging to National or Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities (“Minority Rights Declaration”) were adopted without vote and hence universally supported. See 1981 Y.B.U.N. 879 (1985) (noting adoption without vote of the Religious Intolerance Declaration); 1992 Y.B.U.N. 722 (noting adoption without vote of the Minority Rights Declaration).

However, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights did not enjoy universal support where eight states, including the former Soviet Union and South Africa, abstained. See Verbatim Record of the Hundred and Eighty-third Plenary Meeting, Paris, 10 December 1948 available at <http://www.un.org/Depts/dhl/landmark/amajor.htm> (last visited Nov. 20, 2007) (noting 48 States voting for the UDHR with 8 abstaining: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and Yugoslavia). In addition, the Declaration on the Granting of Independence for Colonial Countries and Peoples (“Colonial Peoples’ Declaration”) was not universally supported where 9 States abstained. See Colonial Peoples’ Declaration, G.A. Res. 1514(XV), GAOR, 15th sess., 947th plen. mtg., U.N. Doc. A/RES/1514(XV) (1960) available at <http://daccess-ods.un.org/TMP/1568189.html> (last visited Nov. 30, 2007) (noting 89 States voting for with 9 States abstaining: Australia, Belgium, Dominican Republic, France, Portugal, Spain, South Africa, United Kingdom, and the United States). Despite their lack of “universal” support, the UDHR is nevertheless considered the foundational document in the modern human rights system, and colonialism per se has become indefensible foreign policy and a violation of the right to “external” self-determination. See Part.I.B.2 (discussing external self-determination).

¹³ The total vote count was 144 States for, 11 abstaining, and 4 against. Azerbaijan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Burundi, Colombia, Georgia, Kenya, Nigeria, Russia, Samoa, and Ukraine abstained. Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the United States opposed the DRIP. DRIP, supra note 1.

¹⁴ See Statement by Ambassador John McNee, Permanent Representative of Canada to the United Nations, to the 61st Session of the General Assembly on the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, at ¶¶ 2-3 (Sept. 13, 2007), available at http://geo.international.gc.ca/canada_un/new_york/statements/unga-

the opposition of Australia, New Zealand, and the United States to the approved text has been more consistent.¹⁵ In addition, Canada's stated reasons for opposing the Declaration appear to be somewhat distinct from those expressed by the latter three.¹⁶ Noting "significant concerns with respect to the wording of the [adopted] text," Canada's Ambassador to the UN, John McNee, focused on three specific areas when speaking to the GA on September 13, 2007: (1) "the provisions on lands, territories and resources;" (2) "free, prior and informed consent when used as a veto;" and (3) "dissatisfaction with the process."¹⁷

By contrast, in a joint statement made back on October 16, 2006 after adoption of the draft DRIP by the Human Rights Council, Australia, New Zealand, and the United States focused on a more fundamental concern with DRIP: Self-determination.¹⁸ These States called the draft DRIP text "confusing, unworkable, contradictory and deeply flawed" and asserted that en.asp?id=10373&content_type=2 (last visited Nov. 19, 2007) ("Canada has long been a proponent of a strong and effective text that would promote and protect the human rights [of indigenous persons] and recognize the collective rights of indigenous peoples around the world. We have sought for many years . . . an aspirational document which would advance indigenous rights and promote harmonious arrangements between indigenous peoples and the States in which they live. However, the text that was presented at the Human Rights Council in June 2006 . . . did not address some of our concerns. This is why we voted against it.") (hereinafter "Canadian Explanation"). On January 23, 2006, the Conservative Party of Canada won a plurality of seats in parliament, creating the proportionally smallest minority government since Confederation in 1867. See Elections Canada, "Official Voting Results / Résultats officiels du scrutin," <http://www.elections.ca/scripts/OVR2006/default.html> (last visited Nov. 19, 2007).

¹⁵ See infra note 18 and accompanying text.

¹⁶ Compare Canadian Explanation, supra note 13, with Press Release, United States Mission to the United Nations, Explanation of Vote by Robert Hagen, U.S. Advisor, on the DRIP, to the UN General Assembly with Annex: Observations of the United States with respect to the DRIP (Sept. 13, 2007) available at http://www.usunewyork.usmission.gov/press_releases/20070913_204.html (last visited Nov. 24, 2007) (hereinafter "U.S. Explanation"), and Explanation of Vote by the Hon. Robert Hill, Ambassador and Permanent Representative of Australia to the United Nations, on the DRIP, to the UN General Assembly (Sept. 13, 2007), available at <http://www.australiaun.org/unny/GA%5f070913.html> (last visited Nov. 24, 2007) (hereinafter "Australian Explanation"). Note, however, that New Zealand's ultimate, though not its preliminary, reasons for voting against the DRIP are more like those of Canada than those of Australia and the United States. See infra notes 21-23 and accompanying text.

¹⁷ Canadian Explanation, supra note 13. In addition to the above three concerns, Mr. McNee also mentioned without elaboration concerns about "self-government without recognition of the importance of negotiations; intellectual property; military issues; and the need to achieve an appropriate balance between the rights and obligations of indigenous peoples, member States and third parties." Id.

¹⁸ See Statement by H.E. Ambassador Rosemary Banks, on Behalf of Australia, New Zealand and the United States, on Item 64 (a) The Declaration on the Rights of the Indigenous Peoples, in the Third Committee of the 61st UN General Assembly (October 16, 2006), available at http://www.usunewyork.usmission.gov/press_releases/20061016_294.html (last visited Nov. 23, 2007) (hereinafter "Joint Statement").

the right of self-determination, declared in Article 3, “could be misrepresented as conferring a unilateral right of self-determination and possible secession upon a specific subset of the national populace, thus threatening the political unity, territorial integrity and the stability of existing UN Member States.”¹⁹ Other concerns raised in the joint statement seem to take root from this one central worry about unilateral “self-determination” potentially leading to secession.²⁰

The final version of the DRIP adopted by the GA contains a provision, Article 46(1), that specifically forecloses the possibility of such a broad misrepresentation of the conferred “self-determination” right: “Nothing in this Declaration may be . . . construed as authorizing or encouraging any action which would dismember or impair, totally or in part, the territorial integrity or political unity of sovereign and independent States.”²¹ Given Article 46(1) and the general disfavor with which international law looks on the recognition of newly formed States, any worry about the DRIP being used in an even marginally effective way to invoke “secession” rights seems extreme at best. However, other rights implied by “self-determination”—short of secession and not otherwise threatening the territorial integrity or political unity of States—are arguably still unilaterally conferred on indigenous peoples.

Perhaps due to the inclusion of Article 46(1) in the final version of the DRIP, New Zealand did not invoke “self-determination” concerns in explaining its continued opposition to the Declaration on September 13. Rather, it stated that it “fully supports the principles and aspirations of the [DRIP]” and, noting the incompatibility of four specific provisions in the text ¹⁹ Id. at ¶¶ 4-5.

²⁰ Note that the joint statement also addressed concerns similar to those raised by Canada—specifically regarding provisions dealing with land and resources—as well as concerns about some provisions being “potentially discriminatory” and concerns about the lack of a definition of “indigenous peoples” in the text. See id. at ¶¶ 6-10. Nevertheless, the overall focus of the statement was clearly on worries about the consequences of conferring a “self-determination” right on indigenous peoples. Indeed, the concern about leaving “indigenous peoples” undefined was explicitly rooted in the overarching self-determination worry: “The lack of definition . . . means that separatist or minority groups, with traditional connections to the territory where they live . . . could seek to exploit this declaration to claim the right to self-determination . . .” Id. at ¶ 10.

²¹ DRIP, supra note 1, art. 46(1).

with its constitution and laws,²² justified its “no” vote as required given its view, contrary to that of most States, including the United States, that the DRIP is more than an aspirational document and has, in itself, binding “legal effect.”²³ As such, it seemed to believe that it would be legally bound under international law to guarantee rights (e.g. land rights and informed consent rights) that it found incompatible with its domestic law.²⁴

Unlike New Zealand and despite the addition of Article 46(1), Australia and the United States continued to invoke opposition to the Article 3 “self-determination” right in explaining their votes against the DRIP. Noting that it has “long expressed its dissatisfaction with the references to self-determination in the Declaration,” Australia proceeded to define self-determination as limited to two scenarios, both, in its view, inapposite to indigenous peoples: (1) “de-colonisation and the break-up of states into smaller states with clearly defined population groups;” and (2) “[situations] where a particular group with a defined territory is disenfranchised and is denied political or civil rights.”²⁵ Australia further asserted that “[i]t is not a right which attaches to an undefined subgroup of a population seeking to obtain political independence.”²⁶ Seemingly ignoring the presence and function of Article 46(1), though mimicking its language, Australia concluded its discussion of self-determination by stating that it “does not support a concept that could be construed as encouraging action that would impair, even in part, the territorial and political integrity of a state with a system of democratic representative government.”²⁷

²² New Zealand specifically remained opposed to “Article 26 on lands and resources, Article 28 on redress, and Articles 19 and 32 on a right of veto over the State.” N.Z. Declaration, supra note 9, at ¶ 6. In addition, it mentioned in passing an opposition to Article 31 relating to intellectual property rights. Id. at ¶ 10.

²³ Id. at ¶ 12.

²⁴ See supra note 9 and accompanying text.

²⁵ Australian Explanation, supra note 16, at ¶ 2.

²⁶ Id.

²⁷ Id.

For its part, the United States’ analysis of Article 3 “self-determination” in opposing the DRIP was more subtle, though apparently just as central to its thinking. In continuing to call the DRIP “confusing” and “flawed,” the United States noted that the right to “self-determination” is addressed in common Article 1 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights²⁸ and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights²⁹ where it is “understood by some to include the right to full independence under certain circumstances.”³⁰

While acknowledging earlier in its explanation that “[u]nder United States domestic law, the United States government recognizes Indian tribes as political entities with inherent powers of self-government as first peoples” and that the “federal government has a government-to-government relationship with Indian tribes,”³¹ the United States asserted that “[u]nder existing common Article 1 legal obligations, indigenous peoples generally are not entitled to independence nor any right of self-government within the nation-state.”³²

The United States declared that the mandate of the Working Group on the DRIP—created by the Economic and Social Council (“ECOSOC”) in accordance with a GA resolution³³—was “not . . . to qualify, limit, or expand” the common Article 1 obligations legally binding on States with regard to “self-determination” rights, but rather “to articulate a new concept, i.e., self-

²⁸ International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Dec. 16, 1966, 999 U.N.T.S. 171 (hereinafter “ICCPR”).

²⁹ International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Dec. 16, 1966, 993 U.N.T.S. 3 (hereinafter “ICESCR”).

³⁰ U.S. Explanation, supra note 16, annex at ¶ 4. Note that this characterization of the common Article 1 right to self-determination is somewhat misleading. The understanding that the right carries with it a right to “full independence under certain circumstances” (e.g. classic colonialism) is held by more than “some”—indeed, this understanding is held by the vast majority of international legal scholars and has almost certainly crystallized into a binding customary international norm through state practice with opinio juris. See, e.g. This “full independence” scenario presumably comports with the first of Australia’s two defined scenarios. See supra note 25 and accompanying text.

³¹ U.S. Explanation, supra note 16, at ¶ 4.

³² Id. annex at ¶ 4.

³³ See E. Res. 1995/32, U.N. Doc. E/RES/1995/32 (July 25, 1995), available at <http://www.ohchr.org/english/issues/indigenous/groups/groups-02.htm#mandate> (click on “resolution 1995/32”) (last visited Nov. 25, 2007).

government within the nation-state.”³⁴ Noting that this “self-government” concept is “not the same concept as the right contained in common Article 1” of the ICCPR and ICESCR, the United States concluded that it was “wholly inappropriate [to] reproduc[e] common Article 1 in Article 3 of the text with no intention that Article 3 mean the same thing as common Article 1, nor that it be considered to explain or modify the scope of existing common Article 1 legal obligations.”³⁵ Because the United States considered the “most significant provisions” of the DRIP, Article 3 foremost among them, “fundamental to interpreting all of the provisions in text [sic],” it concluded that “the text as a whole is rendered unworkable and unacceptable.”³⁶

This comment makes two arguments, one broad and one narrow. Broadly, it argues that U.S. and others’ concerns about the “workability” of the DRIP—at least regarding “self-determination”—are misplaced, and that the meaning of “self-determination” is clearly delimited, not merely by Article 46(1), but by the substantive rights conferred in the DRIP. The comment argues that the appropriate way to read “self-determination” in the DRIP involves a two-stage process, moving from the skeletal right conferred in Article 3, to the more substantive Article 4, and then to specific features of the right conferred in subsequent provisions. This

³⁴ U.S. Explanation, supra note 16, annex at ¶ 5.

³⁵ Id. annex at ¶ 4, 6. Note that while it may indeed be, and probably is, the case that the mandate (and power) of the Working Group did not extend to qualifying, limiting, or expanding “self-determination” rights as that term is used in common Article 1 of the ICCPR and ICESCR, this does not mean that the mandate of the Working Group did not include the articulation of aspirational “self-determination” rights as specifically applied to “indigenous peoples.” Thus, there would be (1) self-determination as legally binding on State Parties to the ICCPR and/or ICESCR and (2) self-determination in the specific context of indigenous peoples as aspired to by the DRIP. The argument that the mandate of the Working Group included the articulation of “self-determination” rights is conclusively supported by the very wording of the mandate itself. In its Resolution 1995/32, ECOSOC specifically stated that it was creating the Working Group for “the sole purpose of elaborating a draft declaration, considering the draft United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples annexed to resolution 1994/45 of 26 August 1994 of the Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities” E. Res. 1995/32, supra note 33, art. 2 (emphasis added). The draft referred to by ECOSOC, the one and only draft the Working Group was required to consider, contained an Article 3—conferring “self-determination” rights—identical to that of the final draft of the DRIP approved by the GA on September 13. See Annex to E. Res. 1994/45, U.N. Doc. E/RES/1994/45, art. 3 (Aug. 26, 1994) (“Indigenous peoples have the right to self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.”).

³⁶ U.S. Explanation, supra note 16, annex at ¶ 15.

broader argument is woven throughout a more narrowly focused argument that examines a single provision in the DRIP—Article 34, conferring rights to “juridical systems”—and its applicability to an emerging concept recognizing increasingly exclusive jurisdiction of indigenous courts that has been called “egalitarian juridical pluralism” by one State that is redesigning its constitution. On this score, the comment argues that “egalitarian juridical pluralism” is an appropriate exercise of the rights guaranteed by Article 34. By examining the applicability of “egalitarian juridical pluralism” to Article 34, this comment seeks to shed light not only on the meaning and workability of Article 34, but also on the content and functionality of the overarching right of “self-determination” conferred in Article 3, “fundamental” as the United States asserted, “to interpreting all of the provisions” in the DRIP.

Part I provides an overview of international law relating specifically to self-determination to provide context for an analysis of the rights conferred by Article 34 in conjunction with Articles 3 and 4. Part II then presents an argument for a two-stage process in reading meaning into “self-determination” in the DRIP. Part III then uses the emerging concept of “egalitarian juridical pluralism” as a test case for fleshing out the rights conferred under the DRIP and then more broadly assesses the workability of “self-determination” under the DRIP paying particular attention to the concerns raised by Australia the United States.

I. INTERNATIONAL LAW, SELF-DETERMINATION, AND MINORITY RIGHTS

To better understand the meaning of “self-determination” in the DRIP and the significance of the growing movement towards “egalitarian juridical pluralism” in States with large indigenous populations, it is first necessary to review the historical development and treatment of “self-determination” under international law. This section begins by providing a general overview of international human rights law followed by a review of the concept of “self-determination,” paying particular attention to its roots in concern for minority rights, and then discusses the important distinction between “internal” and “external” self-determination.

A. Overview of International Human Rights

As mentioned in the introduction, the passage of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948 was a watershed moment in international law, signaling the beginning of the modern concept “human rights.”³⁷ Before the UDHR—and before the Holocaust, which provided the political impetus to create and pass it³⁸—international law was almost entirely State-centered.³⁹ That is, international law only concerned itself with the actions of States in relation to other States (actions “inter nations”).⁴⁰ If State A massacred its own citizens plus the citizens of State B, State A had committed an offense against the sovereignty of State B but had committed no act for which the individual victims could, by themselves, hold it accountable. Only if State B chose to take offense at the violation of its sovereignty could State A potentially

³⁷ See HENRY J. STEINER AND PHILIP ALSTON, INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS IN CONTEXT: LAW, POLITICS, MORALS, 138 (2d ed. 2000) (“Despite proposals to the contrary, the [UN] Charter stopped shy of incorporating a bill of rights. . . . [Instead, a commission was set up] including such distinguished founders of the human rights movement as Rene Cassin of France, Charles Malik of the Lebanon, and Eleanor Roosevelt of the United States [to develop] the draft bill of rights In 1948, the UN Commission adopted a draft Declaration, which in turn was adopted by the General Assembly During the 28 years between 1948 and 1976 [the year the ICCPR and ICESCR entered into force] the UDHR became so broadly known and frequently invoked [because] it was the only broad-based human rights instrument available.”). For more detailed analysis of the drafting history and intent of the UDHR

³⁸ See generally JOHANNES MORSINK, THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS: ORIGINS, DRAFTING, AND INTENT (2000).

³⁹ See H. LAUTERPACHT, INTERNATIONAL LAW AND HUMAN RIGHTS, 61 (1950) (noting that the “international law of the past [was] concerned mainly with the delimitation of the jurisdiction of States” and that “[i]n traditional international law the individual played an inconspicuous part . . .”).

⁴⁰ See id.

be held accountable for its actions against B's citizens under international law.⁴¹ The situation for A's own citizens was far worse. Under traditional State-centered international law, State A could do whatever it wanted to with its own citizens—let them eat cake, torture them, or engage in genocide—without breaking international law.⁴²

Then, the Holocaust and the UDHR came along, presenting significant challenges to the State-centered concept of international law by introducing the welfare of the individual human being as an object of international concern. The UDHR, like the DRIP, was “only” a declaration, yet it carried with it a force that has fundamentally altered the way the world thinks about international law.⁴³ It stated a set of basic rights that all individuals have by virtue of being born human, including rights to “life, liberty, and security of person,” a series of basic due process rights, and a series of economic rights.⁴⁴ All of the rights, with the exception, perhaps, of the right to own property “in association with others” were individual rather than collective rights.⁴⁵ Though they were aimed in grand measure at preventing atrocities like the Holocaust, committed against a collective group, the rights themselves were conferred on individuals, not on “peoples” or other groups.⁴⁶

⁴¹ In such a scenario, B would be exercising “diplomatic protection” on behalf its citizens, and under the traditional system, it would base its claim not on a violation of its citizens human rights, but on a violation of its sovereign dignity. In any case, any satisfaction it got (e.g. an apology, money damages) would belong to it and not to the victims. See In re Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions (Jurisdiction), 1924 P.C.I.J. Ser. A., No. 2 (noting that “[b]y taking up the case of one of its subjects and by resorting to diplomatic action or international judicial proceedings on his behalf, a State is in reality asserting its own rights—its right to ensure, in the person of its subjects, respect for the rules of international law”).

⁴² See Louis Henkin, International Law: Politics, Values and Functions, 216 COLLECTED COURSES OF HAGUE ACADEMY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW 13, at 208 (Vol. IV, 1989) ([F]or hundreds of years international law and the law governing individual life did not come together. . . . What a State did inside its borders in relation to its own nationals remained its own affair, an element of its autonomy, a matter of its ‘domestic jurisdiction.’”).

⁴³ See Henry Steiner, Securing Human Rights: The First Half-Century of the Universal Declaration, and Beyond, HARVARD MAGAZINE, Sept.-Oct. 1998, p. 45 (“[The UDHR] has retained its place of honor in the human rights movement. No other document has so caught the historical moment, achieved the same moral and rhetorical force, or exerted as much influence on the movement as a whole. . . . [It has] forever chang[ed] the discourse of international relations on issues vital to human decency and peace.”).

⁴⁴ See UDHR, supra note 4, arts. 3, 5-12, 22-26.

⁴⁵ See id., art. 17.

⁴⁶ See Morsink, supra note 38.

The principles in the UDHR formed the basis for the creation of two foundational human rights treaties: the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights⁴⁷ and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.⁴⁸ These two treaties, the ICCPR and the ICESCR, effectively bifurcated the rights contained in the UDHR, each elaborating and giving legal force to the rights contained within its sphere. Compliance with the rights contained in these treaties is obligatory for State Parties to them. Enforcement, however, is still largely subject to self-monitoring by States and the realpolitik of international relations,⁴⁹ though one of two optional protocols to the ICCPR broadens the scope of international monitoring and enforcement of human rights violations, including the acceptance of complaints by individual victims.⁵⁰ Together with the UDHR, the ICCPR (along with its optional protocols) and the ICESCR are known collectively as the International Bill of Human Rights.⁵¹

B. Self-Determination and Minority Rights in International Law

⁴⁷ ICCPR, supra note 28.

⁴⁸ ICESCR, supra note 29.

⁴⁹ See Douglas Donoho, Human Rights Enforcement in the Twenty-First Century, 35 GA. J. INT'L & COMP. L. 1 (2006) (noting the “significantly limited enforcement capacity” of the international human rights system).

⁵⁰ See (First) Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, G.A. Res. 2200A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 59, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966), 999 U.N.T.S. 302, entered into force March 23, 1976. The Second Optional Protocol to the ICCPR, which the United States has not signed, deals with abolition of the death penalty. See (Second) Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, G.A. Res. 44/128, U.N. Doc. A/44/49 (Dec. 15, 1989).

⁵¹ See U.N. Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, Fact Sheet No.2 (Rev.1), The International Bill of Human Rights (1996), available at <http://www.unhcr.ch/html/menu6/2/fs2.htm> (last visited Nov. 26, 2007) (discussing the definition and impact of the International Bill of Human Rights). Note that in addition to the International Bill of Human Rights, there are a number of important topical human rights treaties, some of which are explored later in the piece as they relate to indigenous peoples' rights. See e.g., International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, March 7, 1966, 660 U.N.T.S. 195 (hereinafter “ICERD”); Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, Dec. 18, 1979, 1249 U.N.T.S. 13 (hereinafter “CEDAW”); Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, Dec. 10, 1984, S. Treaty Doc. No. 100-20 (1988), 1465 U.N.T.S. 85 (hereinafter “CAT”); Convention on the Rights of the Child, Nov. 20, 1989, 1577 U.N.T.S. 3 (hereinafter “CRC”); International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families, G.A. Res. 45/158, U.N. GAOR, 45th Sess., Supp. No. 49, U.N. Doc. A/45/49 (1990).

Like the UDHR, the ICCPR and ICESCR generally state a series of individual rights. However, there is one glaring exception in both treaties: common Article 1. It states, in relevant part:

*All peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.*⁵²

Accruing to “peoples,” the right to “self-determination” suggests on its face a collective (“they freely determine”) rather than an individual character. Though not included in the UDHR, the concept of “self-determination” appears in the 1945 U.N. Charter, where it is used in connection with one of the purposes of the United Nations: “To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace.”⁵³ But, to understand its use in the UN Charter and the International Bill of Human Rights, it is worth briefly tracing the origins of “self-determination” in international law, noting its close relationship with concerns for the rights of ethnic, religious and other minorities.

1. The Roots of Self-Determination and Minority Rights

⁵² ICCPR, supra note 28, art. 1(1); ICESCR, supra note 29, art. 1(1) (emphasis added). In addition to the above-quoted text, Article 1 also states, in paragraph 2: “All peoples may, for their own ends, freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources without prejudice to any obligations arising out of international economic co-operation, based upon the principle of mutual benefit, and international law. In no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence.” Id. art. 1(2). Paragraph 3 creates a binding obligation on States to promote self-determination in colonies and their ilk: “The States Parties to the present Covenant, including those having responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, shall promote the realization of the right of self-determination, and shall respect that right, in conformity with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.” Id. art. 1(2).

⁵³ U.N. Charter, art. 1(2).

The roots of the concept of “self-determination” go back to the American Declaration of Independence (1776) and the French Revolution (1789) which directly challenged the then-prevailing notion that “individuals and peoples, as subjects of the King, were objects to be [used] in accordance with the interests of the monarch.”⁵⁴ The historical root of “self-determination” is the notion that the government of a State must be accountable to the “people.”⁵⁵

During and after the First World War, the concept of “self-determination” exploded onto the international scene,⁵⁶ invoked most famously (to western minds at least) by President Woodrow Wilson in connection with his Fourteen Points.⁵⁷ Wilson primarily intended “self-determination” as a democratic principle of the right of people to choose their own government,⁵⁸ but not to secede from existing States or to decolonize, though he occasionally stated it in broader terms:

“The fundamental principle of [self-determination] is a principle . . . never acknowledged before . . . that the countries of the world belong to the people who live in them, and that they have a right to determine their own destiny and their own form of government . . . and that no body of statesmen, sitting anywhere . . . has the right to

⁵⁴ ANTONIO CASSESE, SELF-DETERMINATION OF PEOPLES: A LEGAL REAPPRAISAL 11 (1995).

⁵⁵ Id.

⁵⁶ See id. at 13 (noting that for President Wilson, self-determination “was the key to lasting peace in Europe” while for V.I. Lenin “it was a means of realizing the dream of worldwide socialism”).

⁵⁷ For an excellent historical account of the formation of the League of Nations including significant treatment of the use of the concept of “self-determination” see generally Margaret MacMillan, Paris 1919: Six Months that Changed the World (2001).

⁵⁸ See id. at 19-23 (describing Wilson’s conception of “self-determination” as containing four “variants”: (1) the right of people to choose their “form of government”; (2) a means of “restructuring the states of Europe in accordance with national desires”; (3) a “criterion governing territorial change” (that is, taking the interests of populations into account when States divided up territory); and (4) a factor, but not a decisive one, in settling claims of colonies to independence).

assign any great people to a sovereignty under which it does not care to live.”⁵⁹

Despite rhetorical invocation of broad self-determination rights to secede by some,⁶⁰ international law—and States, as its legislators as well as its subjects—initially remained closed to the idea. In 1920, the Council of the League of Nations appointed a Committee of Jurists to decide if the people of the Aaland Islands had a right to secede from Finland and join Sweden.⁶¹ The report issued in the Aaland Islands advisory opinion clearly decided: “Positive International Law does not recognize the right of national groups, as such, to separate themselves from the State of which they form part.”⁶² Aaland Islands went on to state that “[g]enerally speaking, the grant or refusal of the right to a portion of its population of determining its own political fate . . . is, exclusively, an attribute of the sovereignty of [the] State.”⁶³ Thus, Aaland Islands is generally cited for the proposition that in 1920 the right of self-determination was not guaranteed under positive international law.⁶⁴

However, in addition to rejecting a unilateral right to secede and affirming a strong concept of State sovereignty, Aaland Islands did something else: It recognized a fundamental

⁵⁹ Woodrow Wilson, Speech at Billings, Montana (Sept. 11, 1919) reprinted in WILSON’S IDEALS, 109 (S. K. Padover ed.) (1942).

⁶⁰ This view was expressed most famously by V.I. Lenin. See supra note 56 and accompanying text.

⁶¹ For an in-depth historical review of the Aaland Islands case, see generally J. Barros, The Aaland Islands Question: Its Settlement by the League of Nations (1968).

⁶² Report of the International Committee of Jurists Entrusted by the Council of the League of Nations with the Task of Giving an Advisory Opinion upon the Legal Aspects of the Aaland Islands Question, OFFICIAL JOURNAL OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, Special Supp. No. 3, 5 (Oct. 1920) (hereinafter “Aaland Islands Case”).

⁶³ Id. (emphasis added). Note that despite deciding that national groups did not have a right to self-determination that outweighed State sovereignty, the Aaland Islands opinion did decide that, because Finland was not a “definitely constituted State” (recently independent from Russia), the League of Nations could appropriately take action on the case without infringing State sovereignty. Id. at 14. This resulted in an agreement between Finland and Sweden giving the Aaland Islanders a degree of autonomous local government. See OFFICIAL JOURNAL OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, 701-02 (Sept. 1921) (providing the text of the agreement); CASSESE, supra note 54, at 33 (discussing the use of the principle of self-determination to grant autonomy to the Aaland Islanders).

⁶⁴ CASSESE, supra note 54, at 30.

connection between the principle of “self-determination” and the then-emerging principle of “protection of minorities.”⁶⁵ According to the Commission, “both have a common object – to assure to some national Group the maintenance and free development of its social, ethnical or religious characteristics.”⁶⁶

As such, Aaland Islands stated, the “principle [of self-determination] must be brought into line with that of the protection of minorities.”⁶⁷ The Commission noted that “international legal concept[s]” and “the interests of peace” might “dictate” an “extensive grant of liberty to minorities” as a compromise where “geographic, economic and other similar considerations” may preclude the exercise of the “right of self-determination” in its most extreme form—secession or transfer to another State.⁶⁸ In the end, the question of independence for the Aaland Islanders’ was resolved in just such fashion, though not on the basis of international legal right, in a bilateral agreement between Finland and Sweden: Aaland Islanders were given a significant measure of local autonomy.⁶⁹

2. The Modern Standard: External v. Internal Self-determination

In 1945 at the United Nations Conference on International Organization (“UNCIO”) there was debate over the meaning of the term “self-determination” to be included in the UN Charter with arguments advanced by some against inclusion of the term that in some ways

⁶⁵ See id.

⁶⁶ Aaland Islands Case, supra note 62, at 6.

⁶⁷ Id.

⁶⁸ Id.

⁶⁹ See OFFICIAL JOURNAL OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, 701-02 (Sept. 1921).

mirrored the arguments advanced by the United States and Australia in opposition to the DRIP.⁷⁰ After hearing arguments that a right of self-determination would encourage secession by national minorities and lead to “international anarchy,” the Committee whose task it was to draft Article 1(2) of the Charter—dealing with the purposes of the United Nations—confirmed that “it implied [at most] the right of self-government of peoples and not the right of secession.”⁷¹ However, while States were clear that “self-determination” as used in Article 1(2) of the UN Charter did not imply minority secession rights or, indeed, the right of colonies to complete independence, they were less clear on what exactly it did mean.⁷² In any case, the immediate legal obligations on States with regard to “self-determination” under the Charter were minimal and thus palatable.⁷³

During the years after passage of the UN Charter, “self-determination” took on a meaning entirely unexpected (for some): In direct contradiction of the understanding expressed by the UNCIO Committee, many countries, mostly socialist or Third World, began to strongly advocate for a view of self-determination as a right to colonial independence.⁷⁴ The focus was on the right to “external” self-determination, or the right to secede and form a new State or join a different State.⁷⁵ Western States, including the United States, responded by arguing that the UN Charter clearly contemplated “internal” self-determination: The U.S. delegate to ECOSOC

⁷⁰ For example, the Belgian representative to the UNCIO, H. Rolin, argued that Article 1(2) of the draft UN Charter, dealing with “self-determination,” was based on “confusion” and argued that it was “dangerous” and might lead to national minorities invoking it for secessionist purposes. UNCIO, vol. VI, 300.

⁷¹ Id. at 296 (emphasis added).

⁷² See CASSESE, supra note 54, at 42 (noting that “States were unable positively to define self-determination”).

⁷³ See U.N. Charter, arts. 55, 56 (generally requiring States to take “joint and separate action” to advance the purposes of the UN with regard to economic development, human rights, and other concerns); CASSESE, supra note 54, at 43 (noting that the Charter did not impose direct and immediate legal obligations on Member States).

⁷⁴ See id. at 44. This view of self-determination had been articulated before by V.I. Lenin around the same time President Wilson was articulating his views of the concept. See supra note 56 and accompanying text; see generally G. B. STARUSHENKO, THE PRINCIPLE OF NATIONAL SELF-DETERMINATION IN SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY (1964).

⁷⁵ See CASSESE, supra note 54, at 46 (discussing the rhetorical battle between States advocating for “external” self-determination and those advocating for “internal” self-determination).

argued that self-determination meant the “promotion of self-government” and was granted universally, not merely to colonial peoples.⁷⁶

In 1966, the ICCPR and ICESCR were opened for signature and included among their conferred rights, as discussed earlier, the collective “right of self-determination” for “all peoples” in their common Article 1.⁷⁷ During drafting, Western countries fought the inclusion of the collective right to “self-determination” in both the ICCPR and the ICESCR, arguing that these foundational human rights treaties were focused on individual and not collective rights, while the Soviet Union and many developing countries strongly support inclusion of the right as an anti-colonial principle.⁷⁸ The right contained in common Article 1 has been interpreted as containing both a right to “internal self-determination” and a right to “external self-determination,” though historically the focus of the UN Human Rights Committee, charged with monitoring States’ compliance with international human rights norms,⁷⁹ has been on the latter.⁸⁰

“External self-determination” has always been tied up with the movement for colonial independence. Heavily influenced by the 1960 UN Declaration on Granting Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (“Colonial Peoples’ Declaration”),⁸¹ which, like the DRIP,

⁷⁶ 27 DEPT. ST. BUL. 269 (1952).

⁷⁷ ICCPR, supra note 28, art. 1; see supra note 52 and accompanying text (reproducing the relevant text of Article 1).

⁷⁸ CASSESE, supra note 54, at 47; see generally THE INTERNATIONAL BILL OF RIGHTS: THE COVENANT ON CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS (L. Henkin ed.) (1981).

⁷⁹ See generally D. MCGOLDRICK, THE HUMAN RIGHTS COMMITTEE (1991).

⁸⁰ The emphasis on external self-determination is probably rooted in the international law principle—confirmed in Article 2(7) of the UN Charter—of non-interference in the domestic affairs of States. See U.N. Charter, art. 2(7) (explicitly not authorizing the United Nations “to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any [S]tate”). The Human Rights Committee emphasized this point in a 1984 report where it specifically addressed common Article 1. See Report of the Human Rights Committee, U.N. Doc. A/39/40, 143 (1984) (“All States parties to the Covenant should take positive action to facilitate realization of and respect for the right of peoples to self-determination. . . . [However,] States must refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of other States and thereby adversely affecting the exercise of the right to self-determination”). See CASSESE, supra note 54, at 62-65 (noting that “[historically,] the Committee . . . primarily emphasized the external dimension of self-determination [and that] contracting States were debarred by the principle of non-interference from inquiring as to whether internal self-determination was being implemented in other States”).

⁸¹ Colonial Peoples’ Declaration, supra note 12.

reproduced common Article 1(1) verbatim in its paragraph 2,⁸² the International Court of Justice (“ICJ”) authoritatively laid down the rule of external self-determination for colonial peoples in two opinions: the Advisory Opinion on *Namibia*⁸³ and the Advisory Opinion on Western Sahara.⁸⁴

Under the Namibia case and the Western Sahara cases, the right of colonial peoples to self-determination, as declared in the Colonial Peoples’ Declaration, was clearly affirmed.⁸⁵ More interesting for our purposes is what these cases and international practice confirm about the scope of the right to “self-determination” as applied to colonies. Despite using identical language to common Article 1(1) of the ICCPR and ICESCR, the right declared in the Colonial Peoples’ Declaration concerns only “external self-determination” and expires once it has been exercised, either by the choice to form a new State or to associate or integrate with an existing State.⁸⁶

The contours of the Article 1 right to “internal self-determination”—the right to “self-government” rooted in the Wilsonian conception—have been defined with reference to the ⁸² Id. art. 2. Note that in both the Colonial Peoples’ Declaration and the DRIP, the reproduction of common Article 1 only extends to its first paragraph, which declares the right of self-determination for all peoples. The second paragraph—declaring the right of all peoples to “freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources”—is not included. Id.

⁸³ Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) Notwithstanding Security Council Res. 276, Advisory Opinion, 1971 I.C.J. 16 (June 21) (hereinafter “Namibia”).

⁸⁴ Western Sahara, Advisory Opinion, 1975 I.C.J. 12 (Oct. 16).

⁸⁵ See Namibia, 1971 I.C.J. at 31 (holding that “[t]he subsequent development of international law in regard to non-self-governing territories, as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations, made the principle of self-determination applicable to all of them”); Western Sahara, 1975 I.C.J. at 32 (declaring that “paragraph 2 [of the Colonial Peoples’ Declaration] confirm[s] and emphasize[s] that the application of the right of self-determination requires a free and genuine expression of the will of the peoples concerned”).

⁸⁶ See Namibia, 1971 I.C.J. at 31 (noting that there is “little doubt that the ultimate objective . . . was the self-determination and independence of the peoples concerned”); Western Sahara, 1975 I.C.J. at 30-31 (declaring that “[t]he principle of self-determination as a right of peoples, and its application for the purpose of bringing all colonial situations to a speedy end, were enunciated in [the Colonial Peoples’ Declaration]” and that the Declaration was “a system of decolonization based on the [principle of] self-determination”); CASSESE, supra note 54 at 72-73 (noting that the right of self-determination as applied to colonial peoples “only concerns external self-determination, that is, the choice of the international status of the people and the territory where it lives” and that “once a people has exercised its right to external self-determination, the right expires”).

specific political rights conferred in other substantive provisions of the ICCPR.⁸⁷ In other words, “internal self-determination” has generally meant the right to have the essential political rights conferred in the ICCPR protected as a proxy for the existence of genuine “self-government.” In sharp contrast to the right to external self-determination for colonial peoples, the right to internal self-determination is a continuous right.⁸⁸ The right can be conceptualized as applying to three demographics within a State: (1) the whole population, (2) racial or religious minorities suffering gross discrimination, and (3) ethnic groups, indigenous peoples and other minorities.⁸⁹

The first scenario—the right of “self-government” for the whole population of a State—has traditionally been underdeveloped in international law due to the strong notion of non-interference with States’ domestic affairs.⁹⁰ The third scenario will form an essential aspect of our inquiry below, but for now, suffice it to say that it has also been historically looked on with disfavor, generally motivated by a concern about unfettered secession rights.⁹¹ However, the second scenario has been more explicitly developed. In the 1970 Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in Accordance ⁸⁷ For example, the United Kingdom has declared to the GA that internal self-determination “requires that [peoples] be enabled to exercise [the other rights conferred in the ICCPR and ICESR], such as the rights to freedom of thought and expression; the right of peaceful assembly and freedom of association; the right to take part in the conduct of public affairs, either directly or through freely chosen representatives; and the right to vote and be elected at genuine periodic elections.” 1984 B.Y.I.L. 432. The United States has declared: “Freedom of choice is indispensable to the exercise of the right of self-determination. For this freedom of choice to be meaningful, there must be corresponding freedom of thought, conscience, expression, movement and association.” 1974 U.S. DIGEST 48. See also Cassese, supra note 54, at 53.

⁸⁸ See CASSESE, supra note 54, at 101 (noting that “the right to internal self-determination is neither destroyed nor diminished by its having already once been invoked and put into effect”).

⁸⁹ See id. at 102.

⁹⁰ See supra note 80 and accompanying text. However, some scholars have argued that recent practice suggests an emerging customary right to internal self-determination—a right to democracy—for whole populations of States. See e.g., T. Franck, The Emerging Right to Democratic Governance, 86 A.J.I.L. 46 (1992); Anne Marie Slaughter, International Law in a World of Liberal States, 6 EUR. J. INT’L L. 503 (1995).

⁹¹ See generally LEE C. BUCHHEIT, SECESSION: THE LEGITIMACY OF SELF-DETERMINATION (1978).

with the Charter of the UN,⁹² the GA set forth a series of governing principles, one of which was entitled “The principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples.” In the title, the strong relationship between minority rights and self-determination—highlighted in the Aaland Islands case⁹³—is again apparent. The Declaration stated that “the subjection of peoples to . . . exploitation constitutes a violation of the principle”⁹⁴ and, while focused primarily on external self-determination, it included a savings clause that looks in some ways like Article 46(1) of the DRIP.⁹⁵ It stated:

Nothing in the [Declaration] shall be construed as authorizing or encouraging any action which would dismember or impair, totally or in part, the territorial integrity or political unity of sovereign and independent States conducting themselves in compliance with the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples . . . and thus possessed of a government representing the whole people belonging to the territory without distinction as to race, creed or colour.⁹⁶

⁹² G.A. Res. 2625 (XXV), U.N. GAOR 6th Comm., 25th Sess., Supp. No. 28, UN Doc. A/8082 (1970) (hereinafter “Declaration on Friendly Relations”).

⁹³ See supra notes 61-69 and accompanying text.

⁹⁴ Declaration on Friendly Relations, supra note 91, at 124.

⁹⁵ For the text of Article 46(1) of the DRIP see supra note 21 and accompanying text.

⁹⁶ Declaration on Friendly Relations, supra note 91, at 124. Note that the United States initially proposed a different text which would have read: “The existence of a sovereign and independent State possessing a representative Government, effectively functioning as such to all distinct peoples within its territory, is presumed to satisfy the principle of equal rights and self-determination as regards these peoples.” UN Doc. A/AC.125/L.32, 2 (1966). The U.S. proposal thus would have gone much farther than the adopted text in explicitly recognizing the self-determination rights (as embodied in effectively functioning representative government) of ethnic groups, “distinct peoples,” within a State’s territory. However, the U.S. proposal was vehemently opposed by many developing countries who argued that it could be used to support secession by ethnic groups. See e.g., U.N. Doc. A/AC.125/SR.68; U.N. Doc. A/AC.125/SR.69; U.N. Doc. A/AC/125/SR.105; U.N. Doc. A/AC/125/SR.107, 88 (Sept. 4, 1969).

This clause is important to the argument here in two ways. First, it has been interpreted as conferring on racial and religious minorities who suffer gross discrimination and are disenfranchised, a right to invoke self-determination for relief. Given extensive State practice, especially with regard to the institutionalized racism of Southern Rhodesia and South Africa,⁹⁷ it is widely agreed that the right to internal self-determination exists for such groups as a matter of customary international law.⁹⁸ The modes of exercising internal self-determination in this area center on the need to create access to government where it has been denied, and contemplate the granting of extensive autonomy and regional self-government among other solutions.⁹⁹

Second, the savings clause is important in the sense that it suggests a right (albeit as a last resort) to exercise external self-determination in the form of secession by making its prohibition on “dismember[ing] or impair[ing] the territorial integrity or political unity” of States contingent upon States’ “compliance with the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples . . . without distinction as to race, creed or colour.” Where States do not comply with the principle,

In the course of the drafting process leading up to the adopted savings clause, a compromise proposal was drafted with a proposal by Lebanon that—in addition to including a savings clause—would have read, in relevant part: “States enjoying full sovereignty and independence, and possessed of a government representing the whole of their population, shall be considered to be conducting themselves in conformity with the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples as regards that population including the indigenous population and without distinction as to race, creed or colour.” U.N. Doc. A/AC.125/L.81. Unfortunately, no records are available that conclusively suggest the reasoning behind Lebanon’s proposal nor the reason why the Drafting Committee ultimately adopted the language regarding “race, creed or colour” but left out any reference to “indigenous population[s].” Nevertheless, two tentative conclusions can be drawn: (1) the proposal was designed to narrow the broad conference of self-determination rights on individual groups inherent in the U.S. proposal, see Cassese, supra note 54, at 117; and (2) the singling out of “indigenous population” (in response to the “distinct peoples” language of the U.S. proposal) suggests that indigenous peoples were conceived of as having a right to self-determination that would be fulfilled by representative government.

⁹⁷ See, e.g., GA Res. 31/154 A (Dec. 20, 1979); SC Res. 460 (Dec. 21, 1979); S.C. Res. 417 (Oct. 31, 1977); G.A. Res. 41/101 (Dec. 4, 1986).

⁹⁸ See CASSESE, supra note 54, at 120 (“State practice in the UN from the 1970s to the present evidences that the provision granting internal self-determination to racial groups persecuted by central government has become part of customary international law.”).

⁹⁹ Id. at 124.

all bets are off, at least as far as the plain language of the savings clause is concerned.¹⁰⁰ This is in sharp contrast to Article 46(1) of the DRIP, which makes the protection of “territorial integrity” and “political unity” of States absolute and unconditional.¹⁰¹

II. INTERPRETING INDIGENOUS PEOPLES’ RIGHTS UNDER THE DRIP

As explained in the Introduction, the DRIP explicitly recognizes for the first time in international law the right of indigenous peoples to “self-determination” in its Article 3. While the DRIP passed overwhelmingly, objection to this provision and its implications was at the heart of the “no” vote entered by the United States and Australia and the conclusion that the DRIP is “unworkable.”¹⁰² This section begins by briefly reviewing the pre-DRIP treatment of indigenous peoples rights’ under international law, and then presents method for reading the rights conferred in the DRIP that accords with natural language and takes account of the historical development of the concepts of self-determination and indigenous rights.

A. The Fall and Rise of Indigenous Peoples’ Rights under International Law

The first treatment of indigenous peoples under international law came, unsurprisingly, at the time of the European conquest of the peoples in the Western Hemisphere during the Sixteenth Century under then-dominant natural law principles. One of widely recognized founders of international law, Francisco Vitoria,¹⁰³ published a series of lectures On the Indians Lately Discovered, in which he concluded that the indigenous peoples in America had “dominion in both public and private matters” and thus had legal title over their lands, and that discovery alone by the Europeans was insufficient to confer title “any more than if it had been they who had discovered us.”¹⁰⁴ In determining that the indigenous peoples had “the use of reason”—a requirement for the possession of rights under natural law—Vitoria noted “method in their affairs” including “polities which are orderly arranged and . . . definite marriage and magistrates, overlords, laws, and . . . a system of exchange.”¹⁰⁵ Nevertheless, Vitoria concluded that indigenous peoples were “unfit to found or administer a lawful State up to the standard required by human and civil claims” because, among other failures, they had “no proper laws nor magistrates” and that Europeans might legitimately “undertake the administration of their country . . . so long as this was clearly for their benefit.”¹⁰⁶ This theory of administration for the benefit of indigenous peoples developed into the “trusteeship doctrine” of the Nineteenth Century which justified the forced imposition of full jurisdiction over indigenous peoples for purposes of civilizing them.¹⁰⁷

¹⁰⁰ Note, however, that, given state practice and extensive opinio juris, the existence of customary law supporting even an extremely limited right of discriminated groups to secede is doubtful. See Cassese, supra note 54, at 122-24 (noting that “States have been adamant in rejecting even the possibility that nations, groups and minorities be granted a right to secede from the territory in which they live”). But see BUCHHEIT, supra note 91, at 46 (considering possible “grounds” for the “right of separatist self-determination within international law”).

¹⁰¹ DRIP, supra note 1, art. 46(1).

¹⁰² See supra notes 10-36 and accompanying text.

U.S. domestic jurisprudence, particularly two Supreme Court cases, was highly influential in the development of the trusteeship doctrine. In Johnson v. M’Intosh,¹⁰⁸ Chief

¹⁰³ See generally JAMES BROWN SCOTT, SPANISH ORIGIN OF INTERNATIONAL LAW: FRANCISCO DE VITORIA AND HIS LAW OF NATIONS (1934).

¹⁰⁴ FRANCISCO DE VICTORIA, DE INDIS ET DE IVRE BELLI RELECTIONES, 127-28, 139 (J. Bate trans. 1917).

¹⁰⁵ Id. at 127 (emphasis added).

¹⁰⁶ Id. at 161 (emphasis added). The distinction between those laws which were “proper” and those which were not seems determined by the extent to which social organization mirrored the European system. See S. JAMES ANAYA, INDIGENOUS PEOPLES IN INTERNATIONAL LAW 18 (2004) (noting that “the Indians could be characterized as ‘unfit’ because they failed to conform to the European forms of civilization with which Vitoria was familiar”).

¹⁰⁷ As the U.S. Indian Commissioner Nathaniel G. Taylor wrote in 1868: “[The United States had the] most solemn duty to protect and care for, to elevate and civilize [the Indians] as the guardian of all [of them] under our jurisdiction.” Nathaniel G. Taylor, Shall our Indians be Civilized?, in ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS (1868), reprinted in DOCUMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES INDIAN POLICY 123, 126 (Francis Paul Prucha ed., 2d ed. 1990).

¹⁰⁸ 21 U.S. (8 Wheat.) 543 (1823).

Justice John Marshall called the Indians “fierce savages, whose occupation was war,” noting that “[t]o leave them in possession of their country, was to leave the country a wilderness” and concluded, reasoning in part on justiciability grounds, that U.S. title to Indians lands could be obtained by discovery alone: “However [the rule of title by discovery] may be opposed to natural right, and to the usages of civilized nations, yet, if it be indispensable to that system under which the country has been settled, [it] certainly cannot be rejected by Courts of Justice.”¹⁰⁹ In Cherokee Nation v. Georgia,¹¹⁰ writing for a plurality of the Court, Justice Marshall developed what came to be known as the “domestic dependent nations” doctrine, where tribes had a “relationship to the United States [that] resembles that of a ward to his guardian.”¹¹¹

While the civilizing mission of the trusteeship doctrine held sway over international law’s attitude toward indigenous peoples for all of the Nineteenth Century and much of the Twentieth, the modern human rights movement has forced a rethinking of indigenous peoples’ rights in international law. In addition to developing the relationship between self-determination rights and minority rights in general terms,¹¹² international law has specifically set forth indigenous rights in two binding treaties.

The first, the International Labor Organization (“ILO”) Convention No. 107 Concerning the Protection and Integration of Indigenous and other Tribal and Semi-Tribal Populations in Independent Countries,¹¹³ was promulgated in 1957 to provide protection of the human rights of ¹⁰⁹ Id. at 590-91. Later, in Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 515 (1832), Justice Marshall seemed to revise his early views on the “discovery doctrine,” holding that it “regulated the right given by discovery among European discoverers, but could not affect the rights of those already in possession, either as aboriginal occupants, or as occupants by virtue of a discovery made before the memory of man.” Id. at 554. Thus, in Worcester, the Court seemed to recognize the continued possession of inherent natural rights of the tribes to their lands.

¹¹⁰ 30 U.S. (5 Pet.) 1 (1831).

¹¹¹ Id. at 16.

¹¹² See supra notes

¹¹³ Convention (No. 107) Concerning the Protection and Integration of Indigenous and Other Tribal and Semi-Tribal Populations in Independent Countries, International Labour Conference, 328 U.N.T.S. 247 (June 26, 1957) (hereinafter “ILO Convention No. 107”).

indigenous peoples, and included “special measures . . . for the protection of [indigenous] institutions, persons, property and labour.”¹¹⁴ However, after being severely criticized as “assimilationist” and “anachronistic,” the ILO convened a “Meeting of Experts” in 1986 to review the continued viability of Convention No. 107.¹¹⁵ They determined that the “integrationist language of Convention No. 107 is outdated, and that the application of this principle is destructive in the modern world. [Instead,] the policies of pluralism, self-sufficiency, self-management and ethnodevelopment [would] give indigenous populations the best possibilities and means of participating directly in the formulation and implementation of official policies.”¹¹⁶

Out of this meeting and subsequent work at the ILO, a new binding treaty, Convention No. 169, was created to replace Convention No. 107.¹¹⁷ The preamble to Convention No. 169 recognizes the “aspirations of [indigenous] peoples to exercise control over their own institutions . . . within the framework of the States in which they live,” noting that their “laws, values, [and] customs . . . have often been eroded.”¹¹⁸ Article 1 of the Convention defines “indigenous peoples” while also noting that the use of the term “‘peoples’ shall not be construed as having any implications as regards the rights which may attach to the term under international law.”¹¹⁹ This was the ILO’s way of saying that, though the Convention’s text is compatible with

¹¹⁴ Id. art. 3.

¹¹⁵ See ANAYA, supra note 106, at 55-58.

¹¹⁶ See Partial Revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (1957), Report 6(1), International Labour Conference, 75th Sess. at 100-18 (1988) (reprinting the meeting’s report).

¹¹⁷ Convention (No. 169) Concerning Indigenous and Tribal Peoples in Independent Countries, 28 I.L.M 1382 (June 27, 1989) (hereinafter “ILO Convention No. 169”).

¹¹⁸ Id.

¹¹⁹ Id. art. 1.

indigenous self-determination, it does not, and cannot, recognize self-determination rights for indigenous peoples.¹²⁰

However, the Convention does provide for “self-management” by indigenous peoples, defined with reference to the preamble’s call for “control over their own institutions” and apparently synonymous with “self-government.”¹²¹ In particular, Articles 8 and 9 provide significant recognition of indigenous laws, with particular focus on judicial institutions. Article 8 provides that “due regard shall be had to [indigenous] customary laws” when applying national laws and regulations to indigenous peoples and guarantees indigenous peoples’ “right to retain their own customs and institutions, where these are not incompatible with fundamental rights defined by the national legal system and with internationally recognised human rights.”¹²² It also requires states to establish procedures for resolving jurisdictional and other conflicts that may arise in implementing this right.¹²³ Article 9 provides that “the methods customarily practised by the peoples concerned for dealing with offences committed by their members shall be respected” subject to compliance with fundamental national and international human rights norms.¹²⁴ While the ILO Convention explicitly disavows recognizing the right of self-determination for indigenous peoples, it also unmistakably recognizes and purports to develop

¹²⁰ See INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE, ILO CONVENTION ON INDIGENOUS AND TRIBAL PEOPLES, 1989 (NO. 169): A MANUAL 9 (2003) available at <http://www.ilo.org/public/english/standards/norm/egalite/itpp/convention/manual.pdf> (last visited Dec. 2, 2007) (“The ILO’s mandate is social and economic rights. It is outside its competence to interpret the political concept of self-determination. However, Convention No. 169 does not place any limitations on the right to self-determination. It is compatible with any future international instruments which may establish or define such a right.”).

¹²¹ See id. at 9-10 (noting that an “important aim of Convention No. 169 is to set up the conditions for self-management” and discussing examples of “indigenous self-government” as indicative of “self-management”).

¹²² See ILO Convention No. 169, supra note 116, art. 8.

¹²³ Id.

¹²⁴ Id. art. 9.

“self-government” with special emphasis on judicial institutions.¹²⁵ With this in mind, let us turn now back to the DRIP.

B. A Method for Interpreting the Rights Conferred in the DRIP

Like most UN resolutions and declarations relating to human rights,¹²⁶ the DRIP is divided into a preambular section and an operative section. Though it confers no substantive rights, the preamble is useful in explicitly noting the factors motivating the Declaration.¹²⁷ Three central ideas stand out upon reading the preamble: (1) concerns about preservation of culture and the “right of all peoples to be different” (echoing the policies of “pluralism, self-sufficiency, self-management and ethnodevelopment” found in ILO Convention 169);¹²⁸ (2) concerns about advancing equal rights and ending discrimination (echoing the historical principle of protecting minorities);¹²⁹ and (3) a desire to advance these rights, including the right to self-determination, through a “partnership between indigenous peoples and States.”¹³⁰

Turning now to the operative section, the DRIP contains forty-six articles, most of which confer substantive rights on indigenous peoples (positive rights) or place restrictions on State action (negative rights).¹³¹ However, before analyzing the appropriate way to read those ¹²⁵ For a thorough treatment of the letter and spirit of ILO Convention No. 169 see generally Luis Rodríguez-Piñero, Indigenous Peoples, Postcolonialism, and International Law: The ILO Regime (1919-1989) (2005).

¹²⁶ See, e.g., DRC, DERD, and DEDW, supra note 5.

¹²⁷ The preamble actually contains a series of preambular clauses beginning with present or past participles—such as “Guided by,” “Concerned,” and “Recognizing”—indicative of motivation. See DRIP, supra note 1.

¹²⁸ See DRIP, supra note 1, at preamble ¶¶ 2, 3, 6, 10, 22. For the principles developed in ILO Convention No. 169, see supra notes 116-22 and accompanying text.

¹²⁹ See id. at preamble ¶¶ 2, 4, 5, 9, 18, 22. For a review of the historical link between minority rights and self-determination, see supra Part I.B.1-2.

¹³⁰ See DRIP, supra note 1, at preamble ¶¶ 15, 18, 19.

¹³¹ For a discussion of the difference between the positive and negative rights in the constitutional setting see David P. Currie, Positive and Negative Constitutional Rights, 53 U. CHI. L. REV. 864 (1986) (specifically comparing the German constitutional framework, based largely on positive rights, with the U.S. framework, based largely on negative rights).

substantive rights, it is important to note that there are a series of articles that do not confer rights, but rather serve explicitly interpretive or implementation-oriented functions. Articles 38 and 41 through 46 fall within one or both of these latter two categories.¹³² Of these, the most important for interpreting the scope of the right to self-determination is Article 46(1), prohibiting anything in the DRIP from being “construed as authorizing or encouraging any action which would dismember or impair, totally or in part, the territorial integrity or political unity of sovereign and independent States.”¹³³

As noted in Part I.B.2, this savings clause resembles the savings clause of the Declaration on Friendly Relations with one important distinction: Where the latter makes its prohibition contingent upon States’ continued fulfillment of the promised of a non-discriminatory representative government, the prohibition in Article 46(1) is absolute.¹³⁴ It essentially says two things: (1) External self-determination (i.e. secession) is unauthorized by the DRIP; and (2) any forms of internal self-determination (e.g. autonomy, self-government, or other special measures) that threaten “territorial integrity or political unity” of States are likewise unauthorized. The substantive rights conferred in the DRIP must be interpreted with this prohibition in mind.

1. A Trinity of Rights

¹³² See id. arts. 38, 41-46. Article 38, requiring “States in consultation and cooperation with indigenous peoples” to take “appropriate measures . . . to achieve the ends of [the DRIP],” is clearly implementation-oriented (in explaining how—in “cooperation”—States should implement the DRIP) and possibly interpretation-oriented: By calling on States to implement the ends of the DRIP in cooperation with indigenous peoples, Article 38 could conceivably be read to suggest that the rights in the DRIP are not unilaterally conferred on indigenous peoples.

¹³³ Id. art. 46(1).

¹³⁴ Compare id. with Declaration on Friendly Relations, supra note 91, at 124.

Unlike the ICCPR and the ICESCR, the DRIP does not place the right to self-determination in its first article.¹³⁵ Rather, Article 1 of the DRIP confirms indigenous peoples’ “right to the full enjoyment, as a collective or as individuals, of all human rights” recognized under international law.¹³⁶ Nor does self-determination appear in Article 2, which guarantees the “right to be free from any kind of discrimination.”¹³⁷ Not until Article 3 is the right to self-determination declared. This is not to suggest that the subsequent placement of the self-determination right in any way diminishes its importance or its force, but only to note that the first three articles—distinct from the remaining declared substantive rights—together address the three central ideas of the preamble. Article 1 explicitly recognizes “collective” human rights and advances the “right of all peoples to be different” and “ethnodevelopment” concerns present in the first central idea of the preamble through the recognition of the group rights; Article 2 addresses the discrimination concerns of the preamble’s second central idea; and Article 3, when considered in light of the interpretation-oriented elements of Articles 46 and 38, arguably implicitly addresses aspects of the third central idea.¹³⁸ The placement of the “self-determination” immediately after two articles directed at protection of minorities also reminds the reader of the historically “common object” of self-determination and minority rights first declared in the Aaland Islands case.¹³⁹

This comment argues that Articles 1 through 3 should be read together as a trinity of broad rights focused on the three overarching purposes of the Declaration, whose specifics are

¹³⁵ Compare ICCPR, supra note 28, and ICESCR, supra note 29, with DRIP, supra note 1.

¹³⁶ DRIP, supra note 1, art. 1.

¹³⁷ Id. art. 2.

¹³⁸ The application of the “partnership” idea to Article 3 is not necessarily evident from its text, nor is it necessarily implied by Article 46 standing alone. If Article 38 is considered an interpretation-oriented provision, see supra note 130, then perhaps the spirit of “cooperation” and “partnership” is implied in Article 3 self-determination. However, reading Article 3 by itself suggests a unilaterally conferred right: “Indigenous peoples . . . freely determine their political status.” Id. art. 3 (emphasis added).

¹³⁹ See supra note 66 and accompanying text.

elaborated and delimited in the remaining substantive provisions of the DRIP. As regards Article 3 self-determination, our focus here, reference to the specific rights subsequently conferred in defining its scope would accord with the way “internal” self-determination has been interpreted in the ICCPR.¹⁴⁰ Given that Article 46(1) conclusively forecloses external self-determination, the Article 3 right is necessarily a right to internal self-determination and interpretation of its specifics according to a method similar to that used in connection with the ICCPR seems quite “workable” at first blush.

2. Fleshing Out Article 3

Using the proposed method, where Article 3 is skeletal by itself and gets fleshed out in subsequent articles, the first and most important single article to address self-determination is Article 4, which provides: “Indigenous peoples, in exercising their right to self-determination, have the right to autonomy or self-government in matters relating to their internal and local affairs, as well as ways and means for financing their autonomous functions.”¹⁴¹ Despite the arguments of some, as a matter of pure logic there is nothing in Article 4 that necessarily limits the right of self-determination to “autonomy or self-government”; rather, these arrangements are presented as examples of the legitimate exercise of internal self-determination.¹⁴² However, in ¹⁴⁰ See supra notes 87-88 and accompanying text.

¹⁴¹ DRIP, supra note 1, art. 4.

¹⁴² In explaining its opposition to the DRIP, the United States asserted that Article 4 “limit[s] the scope” of Article 3, but concluded that it nevertheless could not support the DRIP. This assertion is odd for two reasons: (1) If Article 4 did indeed limit the scope of Article 3 to “autonomy or self-government,” then the U.S. position that it could support a concept of “self-government” would seem to require it to drop its objections to “self-determination” (because “self-determination” would mean nothing more than “self-government”); (2) the assertion mistakenly seems to rest on the maxim “expressio unius est exclusio alterius” (the express mention of one thing excludes all others). However, that maxim of statutory construction seems inapposite to Article 4, where the language “in exercising their right” suggests a broader availability of options. In any case, “expressio unius” has been heavily criticized by scholars as a logical and practical fallacy, see RICHARD A. POSNER, THE FEDERAL COURTS: CRISIS AND REFORM 282 keeping with the development of the concept of internal self-determination, on the one hand,¹⁴³ and indigenous peoples' rights under ILO Convention No. 169, on the other,¹⁴⁴ the right to “autonomy or self-government” is rightly considered at the core of an indigenous right to self-determination.¹⁴⁵ And, when read in conjunction with subsequent rights elaborating the key features “autonomy or self-government,”¹⁴⁶ most of which focus on the right to develop and maintain various indigenous institutions, the right to self-determination takes on a distinct and somewhat elaborate meaning as applied to indigenous peoples. For example, Article 34 provides: “Indigenous peoples have the right to promote, develop and maintain their institutional structures and their distinctive customs, spirituality, traditions, procedures, practices and, in cases where they exist, juridical systems or customs, in accordance with international human rights standards.”¹⁴⁷ Thus, while the plain language of Article 4 does not necessarily restrict the scope of the right conferred in Article 3, the totality of specific provisions relating to (1985) (arguing that “[t]he canon [is] based on the assumption of legislative omniscience, because it would make sense only if all omissions in legislative drafting were deliberate”), and has been condemned by an unanimous Supreme Court. See Herman & MacLean v. Huddleston, 459 U.S. 375, 386 n.23 (1983).

¹⁴³ See supra Part I.B.1-2.

¹⁴⁴ See supra Part I.C.

¹⁴⁵ In addition to “autonomy or self-government” and the particular rights that go along with it, the exercise of internal self-determination could include, for example, an extensive affirmative action program to increase the representativeness of indigenous populations that have been historically discriminated against. This kind of a program would accord with the application of internal self-determination to racial and religious groups under the Declaration on Friendly Relations. See supra note 99 and accompanying text.

¹⁴⁶ The most important provisions fleshing out self-determination include: Article 5 (declaring the “right to maintain and strengthen . . . distinct political, legal, economic, social and cultural institutions”); Article 14 (declaring the “right to establish and control their educational systems and institutions”); Article 18 (declaring the “right to participate in decision-making in matters which would affect their rights, through representatives chosen by themselves in accordance with their own procedures, as well as to maintain and develop their own indigenous decision-making institutions”); Article 20 (declaring the “right to maintain and develop their political, economic and social systems or institutions”); Article 26 (declaring the “right to the lands, territories and resources which they have traditionally owned”); Article 32 (declaring the “right to determine and develop priorities and strategies for the development or use of their lands”); Article 33 (declaring the “right to determine their own identity or membership in accordance with their customs and traditions”); and Article 34 (declaring the “right to promote, develop and maintain their institutional structures . . . and, in cases where they exist, juridical systems or customs, in accordance with international human rights standards”).

¹⁴⁷ DRIP, supra note 1, art. 34.

self-determination, especially those relating to indigenous institutions, suggests a limiting (or defining) force.

To recap, then, the Article 3 right of self-determination, a right to internal self-determination, should be interpreted in the same way internal self-determination has been interpreted in the ICCPR: As defined and delimited by the specific rights to which it most closely relates.¹⁴⁸ Under the DRIP, this argues for a two-stage process, moving first from Article 3 to Article 4 for the core of meaning of self-determination (“autonomy or self-government”), and then from Article 4 to the specific provisions of the DRIP elaborating the right of self-government in the form of indigenous institutions. As in the ICCPR, a State’s compliance with these specific provisions serves as proxy for its determining its compliance with the overarching self-determination norm.¹⁴⁹ This interpretive method has two principle advantages over a method that attempts to read self-determination as a right broader than the specific provisions that give it life. First, the proposed method makes it much easier for States to evaluate their compliance with the self-determination right. They can, in a sense, use the specific provisions as a kind of checklist; if they have complied with all specific requirements, then they know they have complied with the overall right. Second, the method also benefits indigenous peoples seeking to claim violations of their self-determination rights by giving them specific frames of reference on which to hang claims to rights violations.

¹⁴⁸ In the case of the ICCPR, the specific rights giving meaning to internal self-determination are those that assure the exercise of “authentic self-government” for the whole population of a State. See Cassese, supra note 54, at 101. Likewise, in the case of the DRIP, the specific right that give meaning to self-determination are those that assure such self-government for the indigenous peoples within a State. However, because the means of securing self-government for a whole population differ from the means of securing self-government for a sub-national group, see Cassese, supra note 54, at 102-108 (contrasting internal self-determination as applied to a whole population with internal self-determination as applied to ethnic groups), the particular contours of the right to internal self-determination look different under the ICCPR and the DRIP.

¹⁴⁹ See supra notes 87-88 and accompanying text.

However, while this process moves the reader from generality to specifics, in some ways it merely shifts the fundamental inquiry onto the specific provision at issue. The task still remains of applying a particular case or scenario (that is, a proposed or actual exercise of self-determination) to the most relevant specific provision. As with the application of any particular case to a general principle, difficult fact-intensive questions will remain. However, the argument here is that the resolution of the particular case will be easier within the confines of the specific provision. Under such an approach, one that accords with a natural reading of the DRIP in the context of international legal history, the DRIP should be “workable,” despite the concerns of the United States and Australia.¹⁵⁰

To test this thesis, we now examine Article 34, as a specific elaboration of Article 3, and its application to an emerging concept of “egalitarian juridical pluralism” that has appeared in the new draft Constitution of Bolivia.

III. EGALITARIAN JURIDICAL PLURALISM: A TEST CASE

While international law regarding indigenous peoples has slowly developed over the last half century,¹⁵¹ regional and national indigenous movements have gained significant sway in various parts of the world.¹⁵² Perhaps most notably in current international affairs, Bolivia, where 62% of the population identifies itself as indigenous,¹⁵³ elected its first indigenous president in 2005, and is currently rewriting its constitution, in which one of the most important, ¹⁵⁰ See supra notes 20, 36 and accompanying text.

¹⁵¹ See supra Part II.A

¹⁵² See generally WILL KYMLICKA, MULTICULTURAL CITIZENSHIP: A LIBERAL THEORY OF MINORITY RIGHTS (1995).

¹⁵³ National Statistical Institute of Bolivia, 2001 Census, available at <http://www.ine.gov.bo> (last visited December 3, 2007).

and contentious, goals is redress for subjugation of the indigenous majority.¹⁵⁴ In particular, the Bolivian Constitutional Assembly has redesigned the justice system to include not one judiciary—that is, traditional “ordinary justice” based on the civil law—but two: In addition to the civil law judiciary, the proposed Bolivian constitution contemplates a “community justice” system, or indigenous judiciary, based on indigenous law and custom.¹⁵⁵ On November 24, 2007, the Constitutional Assembly approved on the whole the draft text of the new constitution,¹⁵⁶ though final approval and enactment is still forthcoming.

A. Egalitarian Juridical Pluralism in Context

The constitutionalization of an indigenous judiciary is part of a larger movement for greater self-government among the indigenous peoples of Bolivia, a movement that is fundamentally interconnected with the development of democracy in Bolivia’s history. After living under conditions of forced labor from the Spanish conquest in the 1500s and through the *latifundio*¹⁵⁷ system of the first 120-plus years of republicanism, a 1952 revolution included agrarian reform that gave some land back to indigenous peasants.¹⁵⁸ However, this reform was ¹⁵⁴ See Bolivia Opposition Calls Strike, BBC NEWS, Nov. 27, 2007, <http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/americas/7114506.stm> (“The president has made rewriting the constitution a key part of his reform agenda to give the indigenous majority greater political power but the issue has deepened regional and ethnic divisions in the country.”).

¹⁵⁵ See Constitutional Assembly of Bolivia, Judicial Commission, Report of the Sub-commission for Community Justice, at 8 available at <http://www.constituyente.bo> (last visited Nov. 15, 2007) (hereinafter “Sub-commission Report”) (describing the community justice system).

¹⁵⁶ Constitutional Assembly of Bolivia, POLITICAL CONSTITUTION OF THE STATE, approved on the whole, Nov. 24, 2007 (on file with author) (hereinafter “Draft Constitution”).

¹⁵⁷ The “latifundio” system involved the expropriation of indigenous lands and the creation of large estates on which the indigenous population served feudal labor for white or mestizo landowners. See HERBERT S. KLEIN, A CONCISE HISTORY OF BOLIVIA 209-10 (2003) (noting that “through constant expansion of the [latifundio] system, land distribution had become one of the most unjust in Latin America,” with 6 percent of landowners controlling 92 percent of the land, by the time of the 1952 revolution).

¹⁵⁸ Id.

not comprehensive,¹⁵⁹ geographically or substantively, leaving huge portions of the country's indigenous population unaffected and leaving the beneficiaries subject to deeply rooted political and economic discrimination.¹⁶⁰

In 1994, after decades of more or less organized pressure from indigenous peoples and NGOs, the government instituted a number of important constitutional and legislative reforms with respect to indigenous peoples. In addition to broader changes—including the recognition of Bolivia as a “multiethnic” and “pluricultural” state,¹⁶¹ the decentralization of and inclusion of indigenous peoples in municipal development decisions,¹⁶² and the recognition of collective ownership of some lands¹⁶³—the 1994 constitutional reforms included a limited recognition of indigenous laws and customs as “alternative dispute resolution” mechanisms, so long as those laws and customs were “not contrary to the Constitution and the laws” of the state.¹⁶⁴

Thus, while the 1994 Constitution recognizes the possibility of functioning indigenous courts applying indigenous law, it grants no significant jurisdictional authority to such courts, whose processes may only be used in the “alternative” (assuming full consent of all parties) and whose decisions may be appealed and overturned by any court of ordinary jurisdiction.¹⁶⁵ This model is mirrored, in large part, in the constitutions of a number of other Latin American States with large indigenous populations.¹⁶⁶

¹⁵⁹ In particular, the agrarian reform was focused on the altiplano in the west and left intact the old system in Santa Cruz and other lowlands regions to the east. See id. at 215 (noting that Santa Cruz and some other medium-sized hacienda regions were excepted from the reform).

¹⁶⁰ NANCY GREY POSTERO, NOW WE ARE CITIZENS: INDIGENOUS POLITICS IN POSTMULTICULTURAL BOLIVIA 4, (2007).

¹⁶¹ CONSTITUTION OF BOLIVIA OF 1994, Art. 1.

¹⁶² Law 1551, Popular Participation, April 20, 1994 available at <http://www2.minedu.gov.bo/pre/ley/ley1551.pdf>.

¹⁶³ Law 1715, National Service for Agrarian Reform, Oct. 18, 1996 available at <http://www.inra.gov.bo/portalsv2/Uploads/Normas/ley1715.pdf>.

¹⁶⁴ CONSTITUTION OF BOLIVIA OF 1994, art. 171.

¹⁶⁵ Id.

¹⁶⁶ See Elva Terceros C., Indigenous Law in Positive Legislation, in INDIGENOUS JURIDICAL SYSTEM, 44-46 (CEJIS ed. 2003) (comparing the existing Bolivian system to the constitutional systems of Peru, Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador and Paraguay).

By contrast, the new constitution contemplates a system of “egalitarian juridical pluralism” (“EJP”) where the indigenous judiciary will be on equal footing with the ordinary civil law judiciary, with exclusive and authoritative jurisdiction granted to the courts of each in their respective territories.¹⁶⁷ Jurisdictional conflicts (as well as alleged violations by indigenous courts of fundamental rights) will be resolved by a Plurinational Constitutional Tribunal—the court of last instance for constitutional questions—composed of both indigenous and civil law judges interpreting fundamental rights “interculturally.”¹⁶⁸ Such an extensive grant of judicial autonomy for indigenous peoples is unprecedented anywhere in the world.¹⁶⁹ Taking note of its essential characteristics, “egalitarian juridical pluralism” can be roughly defined in the indigenous context as follows: A system of two exclusive and hierarchically equal judicial organs (one indigenous and one non-indigenous) that together cover the entire jurisdiction of a State with jurisdictional conflicts subject to review only by a court of last instance employing an affirmative action program that mandates the presence of authorities representing each organ.

B. Is Egalitarian Juridical Pluralism an “Appropriate” Exercise of Article 34?

Despite their existing handicaps under the 1994 Constitution, there is strong evidence that indigenous laws and courts are heavily utilized and relied on by Bolivian indigenous communities and their members.¹⁷⁰ In describing their preference for taking cases to indigenous court over ordinary courts, indigenous representatives cite several reasons: (1) cultural acceptance—indigenous law is “based on ancestral values”; (2) transparency—it is “public justice in the presence of the people”; (3) accessibility—it is “oral and free of cost, . . . an act of service [by judges]”; (4) efficiency—it is “speedy and free from corruption”; (5) theory of justice—it is “preventative and restorative” as opposed to retributive.¹⁷¹

¹⁶⁷ See Draft Constitution, supra note 156, at Title III, “The Judiciary and the Plurinational Constitutional Tribunal” (defining as separate and exclusive jurisdictional authorities the courts of “ordinary justice” and those of “indigenous justice”).

¹⁶⁸ Id., supra note 156, arts. 206, 212.

¹⁶⁹ To contrast with just one example, tribal courts in the U.S. system are not constitutionally mandated but created under the auspices of Congress’s Article 1 powers and are thus akin to administrative courts. Any decisions by U.S. tribal courts can be overturned by a simple Act of Congress. See Catherine T. Struve, Tribal Immunity and Tribal Courts, 36 ARIZ. ST. L. J. 137, 137 (2004) (noting that “the Supreme Court has stripped tribes of many of the positive aspects of governmental authority [including] key aspects of legislative and adjudicative authority” and noting “Congress’s plenary power over Indian tribes”).

In addition to the above, there is one very important reason why indigenous authorities are asked to resolve disputes by their members. Of Bolivia’s 326 municipalities, the ordinary justice system only has courts to cover 130, less than 40%; rural areas, and thus indigenous peoples, are the hardest hit by this dearth of civil law judges.¹⁷² As a result, if indigenous persons want access to justice, indigenous law is often their only realistic option. Because indigenous judges do not accept payment for their services,¹⁷³ the fortification and institutionalization of indigenous courts presents a relatively low-cost solution to the problem of inadequate access to justice, and is more broadly understood and embraced by the population served.¹⁷⁴

However, is a strengthened indigenous judiciary in the form of “egalitarian juridical pluralism” an appropriate exercise of the Article 34 “right to promote, develop and maintain . . . juridical systems” and, therefore, of the Article 3 right to “self-determination”? First, it should ¹⁷⁰ See generally INDIGENOUS JURIDICAL SYSTEM (CEJIS ed. 2003) (studying the practice of indigenous justice in the western Amazon region of the country); Marcelo Fernandez Osco, The Law of the Ayllu: The Practice of Jach’a Justice and Jisk’a Justice in Aymara Communities (2000) (studying the practice of indigenous justice in the eastern altiplano region).

¹⁷¹ Sub-commission Report, supra note 155, at 24.

¹⁷² Constitutional Assembly of Bolivia, Judicial Commission, Diagnosis of Ordinary Justice, at 1, available at <http://www.constituyente.bo> (last visited Nov. 20, 2007).

¹⁷³ Sub-commission Report, supra note 155, at 24.

¹⁷⁴ See, e.g., Elba Flores, Chiquitanos (Monte Verde y Lomerio), in INDIGENOUS JUSTICE SYSTEM 57, 147 (CEJIS ed. 2003) (noting the view of indigenous communities in the Chiquitos region (Santa Cruz department) of Bolivia that “[w]e have always solved our problems internally and according to the customs our grandparents gave us, . . . [I]t is difficult when we have to resort to outside justice because we don’t know our rights . . . [The civil law authorities] abuse and mistreat us.”).

be noted that Bolivia is in the process of voluntarily developing its indigenous courts within the framework of a constitutional assembly. No international organization, let alone tribunal, is requiring this process, and because the concept is in its nascent stage, it would be extremely hard to argue that EJP is a binding rule of customary international law.¹⁷⁵ However, its implementation in Bolivia would count as State practice with opinio juris for the formation of a future binding customary rule.¹⁷⁶

It is likewise difficult to argue that EJP as defined in Part III.A is required under Article 34. Article 34 gives the right to develop and maintain “juridical systems,” but nowhere does it suggest that such systems must be of an equivalent rank with ordinary State courts. While it is possible to argue that a right to EJP exists under Article 34 when considered in conjunction with the Article 4 “right to autonomy or self-government in matters relating to their internal and local affairs,” EJP as defined and elaborated in the draft constitution gives indigenous courts exclusive jurisdiction over all matters arising in their territory. It would be perhaps be a stretch of language to suggest that a dispute between a multi-national corporation accused of dumping oil on indigenous lands and an indigenous people is an “internal or local affair.”¹⁷⁷

However, that Article 34 does not require all the features of EJP does not mean that EJP is an inappropriate exercise of Article 34. Article 43 declares: “The rights recognized herein constitute the minimum standards for the survival, dignity and well-being of the indigenous peoples of the world.”¹⁷⁸ Given the process of the constitutional assembly, involving extensive representatives of indigenous peoples,¹⁷⁹ Bolivia appears to be acting in accordance with its Article 38 obligations to take “appropriate measures [in] consultation and cooperation with indigenous peoples . . . to achieve the ends of [the DRIP],” including the development of rights beyond the “minimum standards.”¹⁸⁰ In this sense, the Declaration appears to contemplate a kind of “States as laboratories” approach in international law to further the development of indigenous rights.¹⁸¹ There is nothing inherently inappropriate, and indeed much to be gained, by a State implementing a novel constitutional system that serves as an experiment to be adopted by other States if successful.

¹⁷⁵ One could possibly argue, however, that the general Article 34 right to develop juridical systems—though not requiring “egalitarian juridical pluralism” per se—has crystallized as instant customary international law given the opinio juris of 144 States who voted for the DRIP. See Bin Cheng, supra note 9, at 532.

¹⁷⁶ In developing EJP, the Constitutional Assembly has made specific reference to its existing international legal obligations under ILO Convention No. 169, and while EJP probably isn’t required by Convention No. 169, Bolivia’s belief that it is counts as opinio juris. See Sub-commission Report, supra note 155, at 11 (noting the international law foundation for EJP).

¹⁷⁷ The grant of jurisdiction under the draft Bolivian Constitution is exclusive and territorial, and thus—absent constitutional jurisprudence to the contrary—seems to contemplate according exclusive jurisdiction over such a case to indigenous courts. See Draft Constitution, supra note 156, at Art. 200 (The indigenous [courts] have competence over all kinds of legal relationships, as well as acts and conditions that violate legally-protected rights and are caused by any person within their territorial sphere. The indigenous courts will definitively decide [the cases they hear, and] their decisions may not be reviewed by the courts of ordinary jurisdiction . . .”).

C. Indigenous Courts, EJP, and the Objections Registered by the Opposing States

The method of interpreting the DRIP proposed herein accords with the historical development of the right and the structure of the Declaration, but, how does it respond to the objections registered by the United States and Australia in voting against the DRIP? First, on the specific question of indigenous courts, Australia stated in its voting explanation: “[We are] concerned that the Declaration places Indigenous customary law in a superior position to national law. Customary law is not ‘law’ in the sense that modern democracies use the term; it is based on culture and tradition.”¹⁸² Given the foregoing analysis of Article 34, this objection can ¹⁷⁸ DRIP, supra note 1, art. 43.

¹⁷⁹ See Postero, supra note 160, at 1 (noting extensive indigenous involvement in the Constitutional Assembly).

¹⁸⁰ DRIP, supra note 1, art. 38.

¹⁸¹ For an explanation of the “[s]tates as laboratories” approach in U.S. domestic law see Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1, 42 (2005) (O’Connor, J., dissenting) (“One of federalism’s chief virtues, of course, is that it promotes innovation by allowing for the possibility that a single courageous State may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory; and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the rest of the country.”) (quotation marks omitted) (emphasis added).

¹⁸² Australian Explanation, supra note 16, ¶ 10.

be dispatched with relative ease: Article 34 does not require States to accord indigenous customary law and courts even a level of jurisdictional hierarchy equivalent to that of national law, let alone superior.¹⁸³

Turning to the more central objection to the right of self-determination, it is worth briefly reviewing changes to the stated position of the United States vis-à-vis the DRIP during the last two years. Recall that the U.S. voting explanation on September 13, 2007, declared that it was the mandate of the Working Group to “articulate a new concept, i.e. self-government within the nation state” and not to expand on the right of “self-determination” contained in Article 1 of the ICCPR.¹⁸⁴ As matter of pure fact, it was explicitly within the mandate of the Working Group to use the concept of “self-determination,” albeit not to expand the right under Article 1.¹⁸⁵

In any event, while the September 13 position of the United States embraced “self-government” but rejected “self-determination,” the United States took a different tack in a statement made to the UN Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues on May 17, 2004.¹⁸⁶ Then, it stated: “Over one hundred years ago the United States was in conflict with the Native Peoples of America. In the hundred years since, the United States has adopted various policies—from assimilation to the termination of tribal status to the current era of self-determination.”¹⁸⁷ In describing the “current era of self-determination,” the United States noted that it had a “government-to-government relationship” with tribes and specifically addressed its hopes for the DRIP: “The Declaration should recognize that local authorities should be free to make their own ¹⁸³ See supra Part III.B. In addition, the contention, whether true or not, that “customary law is not ‘law’” is more than a bit reminiscent of Francisco Vitoria’s questionable conclusion that while the Indians had “laws” and “magistrates,” they had “no proper laws nor magistrates” and seems little relevant to the question at hand. See supra notes 103-07 and accompanying text.

¹⁸⁴ See supra notes 34-36 and accompanying text.

¹⁸⁵ See supra note 35.

¹⁸⁶ Press Release, Statement on Indigenous Issues Agenda Item on Human Rights, to the Third Session of the Permanent Forum, May 17, 2004, USUN Press Release # 083(04), available at http://www.usunewyork.usmission.gov/press_releases/20040517_083.html (last visited Nov. 8, 2007).

¹⁸⁷ Id. at ¶ 1.

decisions on a range of issues from taxation to education to land resources management to membership. These are the powers of a government. This is the essence of a federal system with which we are quite comfortable.”¹⁸⁸ The United States used the term “self-determination” but was clearly referring to one component of that term: Internal self-determination. In a position on indigenous peoples articulated by the U.S. National Security Council in 2001, the Council authorized U.S. representatives to promote “internal self-determination” as the concept to be articulated in the DRIP, and that was the U.S. position during the first half of the decade.¹⁸⁹

The reasons for the decision to move away from supporting “self-determination” are unclear, but the change in U.S. position illustrates its use of three different terms to describe the right to be conferred in the DRIP: (1) “self-government,” (2) “internal self-determination,” and (3) “self-determination.” While Australia and the United States made much of the distinction between “self-government” and “self-determination” on September 13, 2007, the U.S. statement to the UN on May 17, 2004 seems to use these two concepts interchangeably. And, indeed, under the DRIP, all three terms should be considered virtually synonymous. “Self-determination” under the DRIP means “internal self-determination” when read in conjunction with Article 46, and “self-government,” articulated in Article 4, is the core of the “self-determination.”¹⁹⁰

CONCLUSION

¹⁸⁸ Id. at ¶ 5.

¹⁸⁹ U.S. National Security Council, Position on Indigenous Peoples, January 18, 2001 available at <http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/usdocs/indigenoudoc.html> (last visited Nov. 26, 2007).

¹⁹⁰ DRIP, supra note 1, arts. 3, 4, and 46.

The objections to the “workability” of the DRIP registered by the United States and Australia on the grounds of concerns about “self-determination” are mistaken, and should be withdrawn. While there may be other legitimate reasons for opposing the DRIP, any opposition should not be based on an avoidable misreading of the concept. The method proposed here accords with both the historical development of “self-determination” and the structural design of the DRIP. It provides a workable framework for both States and Indigenous Peoples as they seek to advance their collective rights, especially in developing and maintaining key institutions of self-government, courts foremost among them. Though individual States, like Bolivia, are free to experiment and develop indigenous courts and other institutions as they see fit, a general agreement, currently impeded only by the opposition of four States, would truly make the drip an effective instrument and “a triumph for indigenous peoples around the world.”¹⁹¹

¹⁹¹ Secretary General, supra note 3.